Jackson is an 18-year-old college student at Georgia State University. He is new to campus, doesn't know many people, and doesn't have much money to spare. Like many college students who dorm, he does not own a car, so he is limited to public transportation or walking within close distance of the campus grounds. One weeknight, Jackson decides to cook his favorite meal, chicken fettuccine alfredo. As he is preparing the pasta, he realizes he's out of olive oil. He has no other alternative ingredient, the grocery stores near him are closed at this time, and he does not want to potentially disturb his floormates by randomly knocking on their doors. Jackson decides to use the community exchange app, specifically made for GSU students. He makes a post to the app, asking if anyone in his dorm or the dorms nearby, is willing to lend or exchange some of their olive oil. After a few minutes, Jackson receives a reply from a fellow student in his dorm only two floors above him saying they are willing to give him the ingredient. Jackson retrieves it from them and is able to continue cooking his pasta without leaving his dorm or spending any money.
